When, centuries after its foundation, Hertford College determined to build its own Chapel, the great Victorian architect Sir Thomas Graham Jackson was commissioned. Jackson was already famous for several Oxford buildings - notably the Examination Halls - and was widely praised for 'new' designs that fitted seamlessly into their Oxford setting.

Hertford Chapel was judged equally successful. Many years later it was further enhanced by the gift of the Tyndale window, made in 1911 for the British & Foreign Bible Society with glass from a favourite firm of Jackson's, and now installed in the antechamber. In its original mahogany frame (Venetian in form - which was a characteristic motif of the architect), the window accords splendidly with the style of Jackson's Chapel.

After lectures on associated subjects and a cream tea, the event will end with a concert by the English Chamber Choir, who have sung for us gloriously many times before. Their programme will include music composed by Sir Nicholas Jackson, the architect's distinguished grandson and Honorary Fellow of Hertford College.
